

Animals change their bodies when they live in places with low oxygen.

The way animal's bodies deal with changes in oxygen has a lot to do with something called the "HIF pathway".

However, the animal, Tigriopus californicus, seems to have lost important parts of the HIF pathway.

Even though this animal has lost parts of the HIF pathway, it still manages to deal with low oxygen in the places it lives.